
Letter from the Editor

EMMETT DULANEY
Anderson University

This is the fifth printed edition of the Christian Business Academy Review (CBAR), for which I have had the privilege to serve as editor. Sure, it comes with perks, like a free entrée at Qdoba after I've accumulated 3,000 loyalty points and a parking spot right next to the building when security is occupied with other matters, but the biggest perk of all is helping each edition come together into a final, tangible issue.

The purpose of the CBAR is to publish manuscripts that add to the body of knowledge, that incite thought, and that promote concerns relevant to Christian business education. It is intended to provide an outlet for faculty and administrators who have devoted their lives to the trade to share and to offer a voice that may not otherwise be heard. While I may not personally agree with every article, I think each deserves to be published and will always do what I can to help it reach this juncture.

This particular edition contains nine articles, and it is my hope that at least one or two of them will encourage you to think about something you may not otherwise have. It is my further hope that the next edition will contain a thought piece from you. For that to happen, you need to look for a hole in the body of knowledge surrounding Christian business education and find a way to address it. Document what you've discovered, format it per the submission guidelines (no 300+ page diatribes), and submit it. From there, we can work together to put your thoughts into the next edition of CBAR for which I have the enviable privilege to serve as editor. I look forward to it.

Sincerely,
